Dwight Turner served in the Royal Air Force and then as a fraud investigator prior to training to become a psychotherapist. While serving in Germany with the RAF, his interests turned towards searching for a deeper understanding of the issues of prejudice and racism he had endured while growing up as the son of immigrants in London. These initial sparks have fanned many of the flames of his journey through psychotherapy ever since.

When I started on the long road towards becoming a psychotherapist, in January 2000, my only initial aim was to do some self-development work. I left school with minimal qualifications, and because of the racism I endured during my schooling, I also had a negative perception of academia, so any idea of doing any sort of degree sat way back in my unconscious. My training was important to me, though. Undertaking a course in psychotherapy offered me the chance to work creatively in understanding myself.
